Isadora Duncan Gives Up Dancing

About El Pasoans

L. J. Locke and his sister, Miss Ethel R. Locke, who is here visiting him from Dublin, Ireland, have moved into their new home at 1718 Montana street.

Mrs. Peyton F. Edwards is ill at Hotel Dieu.

Mr. and Mrs. Stephen Glumaz have changed their residence from 707 Upson avenue to 1912 East Rio Grande.

R. L. Nichols is ill at his home on the county road.

ISADORA DUNCAN

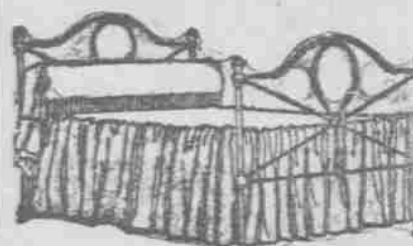

Paris, France, Aug. 28.—"I cannot bear to even think of dancing again." This statement was made by the heartbroken Isadora Duncan, the famous classic dancer, who has been living in seclusion since the tragic death of her two children, who were drowned in the Seine some months ago, when their automobile plunged from the bank.

She cancelled a long South American engagement and is devoting her time and work solely in caring for a number of women at Santa Quamanta, Albania, whose husbands were slaughtered by the Turks.

Her brother is still in Albania and Miss Duncan will return there after a short rest at her studio here.

EL PASO WOMEN LAUNCH NATIONAL SOCIETY FOR GIVING FIRST AID

ORGANIZATION of a national society for extending first aid has been perfected in El Paso. The work is to be directed by the National Red Cross, if approved, which it doubtless will be.

The organization had its birth in the formation here of the first aid classes under the direction of the local chapter of the American National Red Cross. Only those who have received certification from the Red Cross in first aid instruction are received as members. While the local organization was originally intended to be purely local in scope, after consideration had been given the objects and purposes of the proposed organization, it was deemed advisable to undertake an effort to make the society national in character, taking in similar classes wherever formed in the United States.

A preamble, constitution and by-laws were adopted at the meeting, and copies of the former have been submitted to the heads of the instruction for women department, American National Red Cross, at Washington, with an urgent request that the whole plan as outlined in the preamble and constitution, be carried out under the direct control of the Red Cross society.

El Paso in the Lead.
Should the plan meet with endorsement at Washington, the El Paso classes will enjoy the distinction of having originated an educational movement that bids fair to attract every woman of advanced ideas in the United States. It is a movement fraught with untold good, and when the objects of the new organization have been made known, through the medium of the Red Cross society, another nationwide uplift movement, under the sole control of women, will have been inaugurated.

The preamble recites that "in taking up this work, we are imbued with a sincere purpose to educate our fellow women in the principles of humanity, seeking, through the medium of this society, to interest all women eligible to membership in the welfare of the injured and sick, and by precept and otherwise, to promote a more intelligent home care of those who are entrusted to our ministrations during illness or when suffering from injury. By bringing women who are interested in this good cause within the body of our organization, we propose to promote and establish a social as well as an education relationship, and, by the medium of our motherhood, to advance the general uplift evident in the civilized world today, fostered and abetted through the medium of our sex."

The name of the society shall be:

Conducted by MISS JESSIE KING

Telephones 2920 or 2940, day; and 2770, night.

"Mabel T. Boardman Chapter," Associated Classes in Instruction for Women. The objects of the society shall be: To keep up the interest of its members in first aid to the injured, hygiene and home nursing, and dietetics and household economy instruction. To encourage this course of instruction by inducing others to take up the work. To bring together women interested in these subjects into a social and friendly relationship, thereby stimulating members and womankind generally with an enthusiastic purpose to assist in this educational movement.

To furnish in times of extraordinary distress, calamity or war, an intelligent body of women, ready and willing to volunteer in the service of humanity, or their country.

To aid and encourage all civic and national undertakings that have for their objects improved sanitary conditions of living, and moral advancement.

To advance and assist all education at enterprises that will provide children and young adults with a sane and suitable education so that they may enter upon the duties of life equipped with a rational understanding of its pitfalls, its temptations and its handicaps.

To imbue women with a love for humanity; forgiveness of man's frailties; and to encourage women to become home-makers.

Chimpanzee Is Proud Heroine of Real Surgical Clinic

The proudest inhabitant of the monkey house at the Bronx zoo, New York city is Betty, the educated chimpanzee, pet of all the children that visit the park daily. Betty's pride finds its source in the fact that she has successfully passed through a genuine surgical operation, conducted just like any operation performed on a human being.

She was carefully anesthetized by a skilled operator, who used chloroform to still the active workings of her brain, then placed on an operating table, and a surgeon carried out the operation with as much care and attention to detail as if he had been working over a Wall Street millionaire. When Betty came out of the chloroform, she blinked her eyes, looked won deringly about as if exclaiming to herself: "Where am I?"

Great Essayist's Triumph

Macaulay, Handicapped by Ill Health, Persists in Studies and Wins Foremost Literary Place.
By Madison C. Peters

LORD MACAULAY, the purest essayist in the English language, was born in Leicestershire in 1800.

He was baptized Thomas Babington Macaulay, Babington being his mother's name. He was probably the most precocious child the world has known. He read every book on which he could lay his hands and stored up his mind with such an array of literature that he was considered a marvel by all who witnessed his display of erudition.

He was first taught by private tutors, for he was very delicate and unsuited to the rough usages of a public school. Neither did his constitution or his health permit him to take part in the general sports of boyhood, and while the other youngsters of the neighborhood would be romping around in the exuberance of animal youth, the little Macaulay boy would be shut up in his room poring over some old legend or treatise and reveling in the stories of the past. As a result, he was frail and sickly looking with a very pale, but intelligent face and a high forehead, where intellect sat enthroned.

Always Delicate.
Macaulay always remained delicate, subject to periodic headaches, and his stomach always troubled him. He had chronic indigestion and could only partake of the lightest foods. He was a strict vegetarian, his diet solely consisting of cereals and milk, and throughout his life he was a rigid teetotaler. When he was writing "History of England" a slice of bread and a glass of milk sufficed him for a day's work, which began generally at 6 in the morning and remaining at it until late in the evening. In later life he was troubled with bilious attacks, no doubt brought on by his few years' residence in India.

Died at 50; Appeared 90.
In appearance he became intensely sallow, as if suffering from jaundice, and his shoulders stooped from his constant writing and confinement indoors. He died at 50, but he looked like a man of 90. His black hair had turned quite white, his face was withered and wrinkled like a piece of yellow parchment. Despite his bad health Macaulay lived an extremely active life from his very earliest days until the very last.

In 1813 Macaulay entered Trinity college, Cambridge. The next year he wrote the English prize poem and won another prize for Latin declamation. He was next awarded a scholarship and finally his talents led him to a fellowship. At the wish of his father he studied law and was called to the bar in 1826. But the labors of the profession were little to his liking and he soon turned to literature and politics, which he quickly found were his true vocation. Then commenced that series of brilliant essays and criticisms which have placed his name in the foremost rank of English writers.

Becomes Whig at College.
At college he became converted from the Tory politics of his fathers to those of the Whig party, with which he henceforth identified himself. In 1831 he was returned to parliament as a member of Leeds, and one of his first acts was to carry through a bill for renewing the charter of the East India company. He accepted an office of a seat on the supreme council of India and sailed for that country in February, 1834. He remained there almost four years and drew up a criminal code which is still in force. After his return to England he became a member for Edinburgh and soon obtained a seat in the cabinet as secretary of war. All his spare time from politics he devoted to literature and he labored heroically under the handicap of bad health.

Covers Field of Human Knowledge.
In addition to his splendid essays he covered almost every field of human knowledge in his writing—art, science, theology, history, literature, poetry, the drama and philosophy. As a word-painter he has never been rivaled and probably the English language will exhaust itself before his pen is produced again. His wonderful memory, stored with information gathered from a thousand sources, his astonishing power of arranging facts and bringing them to bear on any subject, whether it called for description or illustration, joined with a clear and vigorous style, enabled him to produce historical scenes with a group-like finish and a splendor to which no other writer can approach.

His picture of the puritan in his essay on Milton, and of Loyola and the Jesuits in his letter on the pope; his description of the trial of Warren Hastings; of the power and magnificence of Spain under Philip II; of the destiny of the church of Rome; of the character of Charles II, in the essay on Sir James Mackintosh, are but a few of the many of his bits of word-painting which cannot be surpassed.

England recognized his talents and worth by showering upon him honors and riches. She raised him to the peerage as baron Macaulay of Rothley, but this eminence was short-lived. In addition to his liver his heart troubled him. One morning he was found dead, seated in his library chair. The brilliant pen had dropped forever from his nerveless clutch and the teeming brain was at rest.
